Read the text below and do ALL the exercises that follow it:

Inspector Davies sat in his office, studying the reports on the three people who might have stolen the colonel's collection of rare coins. The newspapers were full of reports of the theft of the year. According to the insurance company, the collection was worth a fortune.

Inspector Davies had read carefully all the evidence given by the three suspects.

First, there was Barnes, the man who looked after the colonel's property. Barnes was quite a small man, and had a very weather-beaten face, because he did a lot of sailing, even in winter. He had been cheating the colonel for years and besides he was badly in debt. Almost certainly he had a set of keys to the house.

Next, there was the maid. She looked young for her age. She seemed honest enough herself, but the inspector had discovered that she was in love with a man who had spent many years in jail. Perhaps she had let him into the house the night the colonel had been robbed.

Finally, there was the colonel's own son. A young man in his mid-twenties. When you met him you were immediately struck by his charm. He always greeted you with a smile, and showed great interest in what you said. He had been in trouble even when he was at the university. He too was in debt. Besides, he could have entered the library, where the collection was kept, at any time. The inspector decided that he must question him again more carefully. Just then there was a knock at the door and Sergeant Smith burst in.

"Sir," he announced dramatically, "the girl has admitted everything!"
