SECTION II: READING COMPREHENSION

(30 MARKS)

Read the passage below and answer the questions that follow:

Breakfast around the world

The name of the morning meal, breakfast, actually means to “break the fast”. Studies show that people who skip breakfast do not work as efficiently as those who eat at least some fruit or a sandwich. But let’s see what breakfast means in different countries.

English breakfast is a type of meal that keeps you going for a long time. It is not only the British who think that bacon and eggs, toast, rolls, grilled tomatoes and mushrooms, fried sausage, butter, marmalade, jam and baked beans taste heavenly. Everyone who has travelled has certainly noticed that the traditional full English breakfast is served in most restaurants in almost all tourist areas.

Saturday and Sunday mornings are often the only time for an American family to be together. These days it has become really popular to spend those mornings together in some local restaurant and eat well without being in a hurry. Today it may be difficult to tell the difference between breakfast and brunch in the States. Many restaurants offer buffet breakfast from 8 a.m. till noon, and you can choose from a great variety of foods: cornflakes, pancakes, waffles, bacon, ham, scrambled eggs, omelettes, spicy sausages, hash brown potatoes, fruit salad and so on.

The Portuguese breakfast often consists of fresh bread with butter, cheese or fruit preserves accompanied by strong coffee or milk. Sweet pastries are also very popular, as well as breakfast cereals eaten mixed with hot or cold milk or yoghurt and fruit.

Breakfast in Italy is always a light meal. It may consist of a cappuccino or coffee and croissant at a bar or coffee and biscuits and possibly a piece of fruit at home. The croissant can be plain, or filled with jam, custard or, occasionally, chocolate. For Italians cappuccino is a breakfast drink and most of them do not drink it after 11 a.m. As a tourist, though, you can do what you like.
